Displaying the seismic history information using tabulations, graphs, and maps. Historical records of any surface effects of past earthquake events are included in the Seismotectonic study. c. Local or Site Geology. Site-specific geologic information is required to determine the potential for surface rupture and to evaluate local site response effects on earthquake ground motions. This information may be obtained through the evaluation of published geologic reports, field observations, and detailed site-specific investigations that may include geologic mapping, trenching, shear wave velocity measurements, drilling, material sampling, and laboratory testing. The site geology investigation could cover the following items: The geotechnical character, depositional history, orientation, lateral extent, and thickness of soil units beneath the site and on adjacent slopes. The character, lateral extent, and thickness of rock units at the site area. The structural geology of the site to include rock unit attitudes, faults and joint systems, folding, and intrusive bodies. The age and activity level of faults in the dam and reservoir area. The geohydrology of the site area to include water table conditions, soil and rock transmissivity coefficients, and recharge areas. The existing and potential ground failure and subsidence, including rock and soil stability, dispersive soil conditions, and soil units exhibiting characteristics for potential liquefaction. The potential for seiche action by examination of fault location, reservoir shape, topography, and slope stability conditions. d. Seismic Attenuation. The seismotectonic study can provide support to determine ground motions at the site and the attenuation of seismic ground motion with distance. Because of the inhomogeneity . . . This item...
